ringing. The main abhounted that Mr. and Mrs. Cable were out. It was enough for Droom. He put the puzzle together in that instant. David Cable's face was the one he had seen, not James Bansemer's. The maid set up a hysterical shricking when he bluntly told her of the mishap to her mistress. but he did not wait to answer questions. He was off to find James Bausemer. The volcano he had been watching so long was about to burst, and he knew it.

Forgetting his wet garments, he entered a drug store and telephoned to Bansemer's home. His employer answered the call so readily that Droom tnew he had not been far from the instrument that evening. There was a note of disappointment in his voice when Droom's hoarse tones replied to his polite "Hello!"

"I'll be over in half an hour," said Droom. "Very important business. Is Graydon there?"

"He's just gone to Cable's. Some one telephoned for him a minute or so ago. What's wrong? Do you know?" "I'll be there in fifteen minutes," was all that Droom would say.

Elias' memory could not carry him back to the time when he had hired a cab. A cab was one of the luxuries he had not cultivated. One can only imagine his surprise, then, when he found himself hailing a passing hansom, and greater the surprise he must have felt when he clambered in and ordered the driver to go in a gallop to a certain place in Wells street. Ten minutes later he was attired in dry. bound for Bansemer's home. What he said to James Bansemer on that memorable occasion need not be repeated. It is only necessary to say that his host was bitterly impressed and willing to admit that the developments might prove serious. They could only speculate as to what had transpired between David Cable and his wife out there by the sea wall, but it was enough for them to know that a crisis was at hand. We'll see what the morning papers say about the affair," said Bansemer, uneasy and cold.

The morning papers were full of the sensational robbery, the prominence of attack. Elias Droom read the ac They say she'll be all right. Sure! counts eagerly as he breakfasted in She's been hurt a little, sir." that fell to him, and he actually cac body. kled over the new developments in the name of James Bansemer was not mentioned. The reports from the bedside of the robber's victim were most optimistic. She was delirious from the effects of the shock, but no serious re sults were expected. The great headlines on the first page of the paper he was reading set his mind temporarily at rest. There was no suggestion of truth in them.

The reader of this narrative, who knows the true facts in the case, is doubtless more interested in the movements and emotions of David Cable than in the surmises of others. It would be difficult for a certainty to ask one to put himself in Cable's place and to experience the sensations of that unhappy man as he fled along the darkeshore of the lake. Perhaps much will be taken on faith if the writer simply says that the fugitive finally slunk from the weeds and refuse of what was then called "the district of Lake Michigan"-"Streeterville" in local parlance to find himself panting and terror stricken in the bleak east end of Chicago avenue. It was not until then that he secured control of his nerves and resorted to the stealth and cunning of the real criminal.

From that time until he stood shivering and white with dogged intention in a theater foyer, bent upon establishing an alibi, his movements are scarcely worth the details. Between the acts he saw a dozen men whom he knew and he took drinks with several of them. His tremendous will power carried him through the ordeal in a way that could not have fallen to the good fortunes of the ordinary lawbreaker.

Every second of the time his thoughts were of the thing which was being buffeted by the icy waters of the lake. Where was that thing now! How far out into the lake had it been

His body was covered with the cold perspiration of dread and horror. His soul was mosning; his whole being was aghast with the awfulness of the deed; he could have shrieked aloud in his madness. How he lived through the hour in that theater he never could have told, nor could be believe that he was sitting there with all those frightful thoughts piling themselves upon and groaned within himself.

He had killed her! She had been true self as the slayer.

Would her body be recovered? What tremors with each.

But why dwell upon the feelings of this miserable wretch? Why say more of his terror, his misery. his remorse? He held himself in the seat until the middle of the last act of the play. At last unable to restrain himself longer. he arose and almost ran from the theater. That instinct which no slayer can control or explain was overpowering him. It was the instinct which attracts the murderer to the spot where his crime was committed. No man can describe or define this resistless impulse, and yet all criminology records it, clear and unmistakable. It is no less than a form of curiosity. Driven by this irresistible force. David Cable. with bravado that cost him dearly, worked his uninterrupted way to the kidney or bladder trouble if you reascene of his crime. By trolley car to lized that neglect might result in less dog scenting his way fearfully, to and cures all kidney and bladder dis-Chicago avenue and then, like a home-

The figure of a man could be seen standing like a statue on the very spot where he had seen her disappear. While he stood there, his heart scarcely beating, the solitary figure was foined by two others. Cable shrank back into the dense shadows. Like a flash it occurred to him that they were searching for the body. A shrick of agony arose to his lips. But he check-

Far off on one of the crosstown streets a newsboy was calling an extra-hoarse, unintelligible shouts that froze his blood. He bent his ear to catch the faraway words of the boy, "All about de nor' side murder!" He cringed and shook under the raucous shout. He knew what it meant.

A policeman suddenly turned the corner and came toward him. The first impulse was to fly; the next was to stand and deliver himself. The resolution came with shocking unexpectedness. He would give himself up! He would admit that he had killed his wife! The words of angulsh were on his lips when the policeman spoke. "Is it you, Mr. Cable? How is she,

Cable did not hear the man, for, as he opened his lips to cry out his own guilt, a thought formed in his brain that almost staggered him with its cunning savagery. Why not let the penalty fall on James Bansemer? She had gone out to meet him! If she had not destroyed the note it would hang warm clothes and in the cab again, James Bansemer, and James Bansemer was worse than a murderer. But even as this remarkable thought rushed into his brain the last words of the officer began to drive it out.

"Is she going to pull through, sir?" was the next question, and he caught It vaguely.

"Pull through?" he murmured inarticulately. He leaned against a great stone rail suddenly. Everything was leaping before his eyes. "Good Lord, Mr. Cable-I-I forgot.

Don't you know about it?" gasped the officer. "Know what?" asked Cable, completely dazed. "Go bome at once, sir. I didn't mean the victim and the viciousness of the to-oh, hurry, sir. Don't be worried.

But Cable was off like a deer for his home, racing as though on air. Nothing else mattered now. She was alive! He could have her with him again to love as he never had loved her before.

WO days passed before Da vid Cable was permitted to see his wife. During those trying hours he lived an age of agony in suspense. She had been removed to her some late on the night of the "holdup," as the newspapers felt justified in calling it. He did not go to his office the next day nor the next, but haunted her door, sleepless, nervous, held close by dread. A dozen times at least be sought admittance to her room, but was always turned away, cursing the doctor and the nurses for their inter-

His worst fear, however, was that his wife would not forgive him. Not the dread of exposure nor his own shame or remorse, not even the punishment that the law might inflict. could be compared to the fear of what might be her lifelong hatred. He grew to feel that the doctor, the nurses, the servants, looked upon him with strange, unfriendly though respectful eyes. In his heart he believed that his wife had cursed him in their presence, laying bare his part in the unhappy transaction.

At last the suspense became unbearable. He had noticed a slight change him. Other people laughed and shout in Jane's manner and at once attribed with happiness; he stared and wept uted it to something his wife had in his heart and shivered and cringed said, for Jane had been allowed in the sick room. The discovery that she was not his child had not as yet struck to him, and yet he had taken her life, deep into his understanding. In a the life she had given him! He gave vague sort of way he realized that she no thought to Jane, no thought to was different, now that he knew, but Bansemer. He thought only of him it was impossible for him to consider her in any other light than that of the years gone by. The time would come would be his excuse, what his punishment? The gallows? A thousand hor rors ran riot in his brain, a thousand bor tremors with each.
